Green and Brock refer to this method as "Pinocchio circling": just as the puppet's nose signaled when he told a falsehood, authors also leave clues when they are being untruthful.

A key feature particular to stories is that they have the ability to transport the reader. While experiencing stories, one can feel emotionally involved and as if being swept away as a participant. ① There is some evidence that being transported into a story requires a suspension of disbelief; enjoying Jurassic Park or a Harry Potter tale may involve putting aside what one knows about the world that contradicts the story. ② A story that suggests an unexpected outcome ("George Washington declined the nomination to become the first president of the United States") results in readers being slower to verify well-known facts ("George Washington was elected first president of the United States"). ③ This suspension of disbelief may make one less likely to spot problems in a narrative, as illustrated by a study in which participants read a story and circled any "false notes" or parts that did not make sense. ④ But readers who were more transported by the story spotted fewer "Pinocchios." ⑤

Advertising may be a fixture in a company's annual spend, but management boards are increasingly questioning why this is.

Marketing is based on notions that are 20 years out of date. The notion that if you put enough messages out there some of them will be heard. The notion that 'building the brand' is money well spent. The notion that people believe what they see and read. Recent initiatives to take advantage of Web 2.0 technologies are merely reactions that apply old techniques to new media. ① Marketing needs to rethink the messages it is communicating, to whom it's communicated and the methods being used. ② Many companies are disappointed at the lack of tangible return on their multi-million pounds marketing activities. ③ Advertising remains the largest budget item on most firms' marketing plans. ④ The most recent Brandchannel survey illustrates this point well. ⑤Four of the world's five largest brands have never conducted any advertising, and the same is true for seven out of the 10 fastest-growing brands. There is no proven causal relationship between advertising and financial performance. And advertising is just the tip of the melting marketing iceberg.

Mutations that in our environment of abundant food now drive us towards obesity, on the other hand, were incorporated into the population.

In the past there was little genetic pressure to stop people from becoming obese. ① Genetic mutations that drove people to consume fewer calories were much less likely to be passed on, because in an environment where food was scarcer and its hunting or gathering required considerable energy outlay, an individual with that mutation would probably die before they had a chance to reproduce. ② Things are of course very different now but the problem is that evolutionary timescales are long. ③ It's only in the last century or so, approximately 0.00004 percent of mammalian evolutionary time, that we managed to tweak our environment to such a degree that we can pretty much eat whatever we want, whenever we want it. ④ Evolution has another couple of thousand years to go before it can catch up with the current reality of online food shopping and delivery. ⑤

If the great jazz musician Sidney Bechet were to hear of such a conclusion he would be surprised indeed.

The idea of family support, suggested as one of the preconditions of any child's success, is far from being faultless. ① Thus, for example, the well-known musical psychologist Jane Davidson and her colleagues state that all the parents of children who later become successful musicians were, in fact, their charges' great friends and allies from earliest childhood. ② His altogether respectable parents, who dreamed of something rather more substantial and reliable than a career in music for their son, actually hid his clarinet from him. ③ Robert Schumann's mother, the widow of a publisher and literary translator, reconciled herself only with difficulty to her son's choice of music as a profession; while Christoph W. Gluck, the great reformer of opera, was forced to roam about Italy and Bohemia after being expelled from home by his father. ④ Even some of the great musical geniuses, it is clear, were given switches and coal by an unkind Fate instead of the presents other youngsters received. ⑤ The 'universal support' given by parents to beginning musicians turns out, upon closer examination, to be a myth.

In the past there was little genetic pressure to stop people from becoming obese. _____, because in an environment where food was scarcer and its hunting or gathering required considerable energy outlay, an individual with that mutation would probably die before they had a chance to reproduce. Mutations that in our environment of abundant food now drive us towards obesity, on the other hand, were incorporated into the population. Things are of course very different now but the problem is that evolutionary timescales are long. It's only in the last century or so, approximately 0.00004 percent of mammalian evolutionary time, that we managed to tweak our environment to such a degree that we can pretty much eat whatever we want, whenever we want it. Evolution has another couple of thousand years to go before it can catch up with the current reality of online food shopping and delivery.

The idea of family support, suggested as one of the preconditions of any child's success, _____. Thus, for example, the well-known musical psychologist Jane Davidson and her colleagues state that all the parents of children who later become successful musicians were, in fact, their charges' great friends and allies from earliest childhood. If the great jazz musician Sidney Bechet were to hear of such a conclusion he would be surprised indeed. His altogether respectable parents, who dreamed of something rather more substantial and reliable than a career in music for their son, actually hid his clarinet from him. Robert Schumann's mother, the widow of a publisher and literary translator, reconciled herself only with difficulty to her son's choice of music as a profession; while Christoph W. Gluck, the great reformer of opera, was forced to roam about Italy and Bohemia after being expelled from home by his father. Even some of the great musical geniuses, it is clear, were given switches and coal by an unkind Fate instead of the presents other youngsters received. The 'universal support' given by parents to beginning musicians turns out, upon closer examination, to be a myth.

A key feature particular to stories is that they have the ability to transport the reader. While experiencing stories, one can feel emotionally involved and as if being swept away as a participant. There is some evidence that being transported into a story requires a suspension of disbelief; enjoying Jurassic Park or a Harry Potter tale may _____. A story that suggests an unexpected outcome ("George Washington declined the nomination to become the first president of the United States") results in readers being slower to verify well-known facts ("George Washington was elected first president of the United States"). This suspension of disbelief may make one less likely to spot problems in a narrative, as illustrated by a study in which participants read a story and circled any "false notes" or parts that did not make sense. Green and Brock refer to this method as "Pinocchio circling": just as the puppet's nose signaled when he told a falsehood, authors also leave clues when they are being untruthful. But readers who were more transported by the story spotted fewer "Pinocchios."
