Unless you're one of those lucky people who only drive new cars, on at least one occasion you've probably experienced the painful realization that your car is too old and no longer worth repairing any more. As a car ages, more and more things can go wrong and need fixing. At some point, the owner needs to decide: is it worth getting this latest issue looked at or is it time to give up on this car and find another? The problem is that a lot of money has already been spent on the car, and scrapping it makes it seem as if that money has just been wasted, which makes it very difficult to choose the best option. It's a problem known as entrapment, when a person gets trapped into making the wrong decision just because _____.
