Soon after the conversation with Alec, his parents, Marko and Elizabeth, ① arrived home. I was waiting outside to meet them as they made their way to the house. Would they like me? If they didn't want me, what would I do? Spend eternity alone? They walked through the door and I gulped rather too ② loudly. They were both very charming, with the same fair skin and crystal blue eyes that Alec has. "Rebecca," Elizabeth's ③ excited voice called, "I'm so glad to see you. I've been dying to meet you, welcome to the family." And with that all my worries ④ were disappeared. Alec introduced me to his parents formally. Elizabeth told me ⑤ to call her Beth. She wrapped her arms around me in an unbreakable but gentle hold with a smile on her face. Marko also smiled at me warmly. "Welcome, Becca. How are you feeling? You're part of this family now, you can ⑥ be assured of that." They welcomed me into their family. I spent a couple of hours with them. It was so easy ⑦ being in their company.

Large teams are notorious for needing multiple steps ① to make most decisions. White and Black American students ⑤ alike from New York to San Francisco began picketing Woolworth's in support of the "Greensboro Four." There are ① fascinating effects of group size. In a dyad or triad, the host usually has the edge over the visitor; the host is more likely to get his or her own way. Thus, a businessperson can strike a better deal by inviting the other person to his or her office. But such territorial dominance — the so-called home court advantage — may ② disappear if the group is larger than a triad. In public places, a large group may also inhibit an individual from helping someone in distress. More than 50 studies have shown consistently ③ that people are less likely to help a victim if others are around than if they are alone with the victim. A major reason is that the knowledge that others are present and available to respond ④ to allow the individual ⑤ to shift some of the responsibility to others. The same factor operates in "social loafing": As the size of a group performing a certain task increases, each member tends ⑥ to work less hard.

Markets represent an institutional arena ① in which exchanges (buying and selling) of final goods and services and factors of production (labor, capital and natural resources) ② take place. Traditionally, economists group markets into two broad categories, namely product and factor markets. The product market is where the exchange of final goods and services ③ occurs. In this market, demand and supply provide information about households and firms, respectively. The factor market ④ refers exclusively to the buying and selling of basic resources, such as labor, capital and natural resources. In this submarket, demand imparts market information about firms and supply provides information about households. That is, households are the suppliers of labor, capital and natural resources, while firms are the buyers, and in turn ⑤ use these items to produce final goods and services for the product market. Clearly, then, the roles ⑥ are played in the factor market by households and firms respectively ⑦ are the reverse of their roles in the product market.

All societies evolve rules of etiquette, good manners, and tact that specify what is or is not appropriate ① to say in any given situation. We learn as part of our acculturation into the family ④ that in the interests of getting along with each other, ⑤ it is important to withhold some of our perceptions and feelings ⑥ because to say them out loud might hurt or offend others. And if we hurt others, that permits them ⑦ to hurt us back, which makes social life generally too ⑧ dangerous. We learn that some of these things can be said to friends and even more can be said to intimates. We know that negotiators often assume a situation is distributive and therefore competitive when indeed it is not ① necessarily so. In the classic negotiation primer, Fisher and Ury give the example of two individuals ② fighting over a small number of oranges. Each needs the oranges for worthwhile purposes and there is no way to obtain additional oranges. The negotiators begin using competitive strategies — trying to convince each other ③ to give up or sell the oranges. Because their claims on the oranges ④ were assumed to be mutually exclusive, no deal could ⑤ be reached — more oranges for one negotiator meant fewer oranges for ⑥ the other. Then they changed to an integrative bargaining strategy. They sought ⑦ to learn more about each other's needs with the goal of helping each other ⑧ meet their needs. I confess ① that one of the most suggestive theories that I learned of in my course on the economics of science at the London School of Economics and Political Science ② was that of the 'tournament model'. It may be well known to many readers, but I was surprised that something that I thought ③ was highly intuitive, such as human resource management, could ④ be described in terms of an elaborate theory. They argued that a worker's performance (both evaluated and the incentive) can ⑥ be modelled as a tennis tournament. There is only one prize: ⑦ both you win and have everything or you lose and have nothing; glory is only for the first. And most US/UK experts who analyse the behaviour of science ⑧ consider that this model fits the profession of a scientist like a glove. Why? Horses have ⑥ to be fed, which required massive supplies of hay and oats ⑦ to be brought into the city, and once ⑧ feeding, horses created wastes that fouled the streets and made walking an unpleasant, unhealthy, and smelly business, especially during fly season. The new system of fashion that ① has emerged from the digital revolution ② is largely centered, in marketing terms, on popular bloggers, who have unprecedented influence due to their massive numbers of subscribers. If an elite blogger (an "influencer") has more than half a million subscribers, his or her influence can be worth a significant amount of money: the value of a single post ③ mentioning a particular brand is in the range of five figures. Obviously, this approach leads to limited ability to make independent critical judgments. However, when ④ choosing an outfit for a photoshoot, an influential blogger ⑤ is guided not only by the profit motive but also, and primarily, by a sense of style. Otherwise, the trust of subscribers may ⑥ be lost. For subscribers, their idol is not merely a guide to the latest fashion, but is the key to an aspirational lifestyle. The direct personal contact between popular bloggers and their subscribers ⑦ allows the former ⑧ to be an intermediary between the brand and the consumer. Thinkers of the eighteenth century puzzled over ① what contemporary aesthetics calls 'the paradox of negative emotion in art'. He wondered about the nature of this apparently 'secret charm that draws us to artistic depictions of ④ overwhelming events, ⑤ during at the same time an internal tremor tells us that we are contradicting our own understanding of pleasure'. David Hume also underlines the strangeness of this pleasure that seems ⑥ to contradict our human nature: 'It seems an unaccountable pleasure, which the spectators of a well-written tragedy receive from sorrow, terror, anxiety, and ⑦ other passions that are in themselves disagreeable and uneasy. Until the mid-1800s it was not clear to what extent the laws of physics and chemistry, which ① were formulated from the observed behavior of inanimate matter, could ② be applied to living matter. It was certainly evident that on the large scale the laws were applicable. Animals are clearly subject to the same laws of motion as inanimate objects. The question of applicability ③ arose on a more basic level. Living organisms ④ are very complex. A cell, which is the basic building block of tissue, ⑥ contains on the average 10^{14} atoms. Living organisms exhibit properties not ⑦ found in inanimate objects. They grow, reproduce, and decay. These phenomena are so different from the predictable properties of inanimate matter ⑧ that many scientists in the early 19th century believed that different laws governed the structure and organization of molecules in living matter. Even the physical origin of organic molecules ⑨ was in question. These molecules tend ⑩ to be larger and more complex than molecules ⑪ obtained from inorganic sources. It was thought that the large molecules ⑫ found in living matter could ⑬ be produced only by living organisms through a "vital force" that could not ⑭ be explained by the existing laws of physics. Soon thereafter many other organic molecules ⑯ were synthesized without the intervention of biological organisms. A wise king wanted his only son also ① to be a wise man before becoming his successor. The king was an extraordinary man who selected a very strange way. Markets represent an ① institutional arena in which exchanges (buying and selling) of final goods and services and factors of production (labor, capital and natural resources) take place. Traditionally, economists group markets into two ② broad categories, namely product and factor markets. The product market is where the exchange of ③ final goods and services occurs. In this market, demand and supply provide information about households and firms, respectively. The factor market refers ④ inclusively to the buying and selling of ⑤ basic resources, such as labor, capital and natural resources. In this submarket, demand ⑥ imparts market information about firms and supply provides information about households. That is, households are the ⑦ suppliers of labor, capital and natural resources, while firms are the buyers, and in turn use these items to produce final goods and services for the product market. Clearly, then, the roles played in the factor market by households and firms respectively are the ⑧ reverse of their roles in the product market.

Each needs the oranges for worthwhile purposes and there is no way to ③ obtain additional oranges. The negotiators begin using ④ competitive strategies — trying to convince each other to give up or sell the oranges. Because their claims on the oranges were assumed to be mutually ⑤ exclusive, no deal could be reached — more oranges for one negotiator meant fewer oranges for the other. Then they changed to an ⑥ integrative bargaining strategy. They sought to learn more about each other's needs with the goal of helping each other meet their needs. It may be well known to many readers, but I was surprised that something that I thought was highly ① intuitive, such as human resource management, could be described in terms of an ② elaborate theory. The tournament theory was described in 1981 by economists Edward Lazear and Sherwin Rosen. They argued that a worker's performance (both evaluated and the incentive) can be ③ modelled as a tennis tournament. There is only one prize: either you win and have everything or you lose and have nothing; ④ glory is only for the first. And most US/UK experts who analyse the behaviour of science consider that this model ⑤ fits the profession of a scientist like a glove. Why? Because everyone knows the winners of the Tour de France, but ⑥ somebody remembers the runners-up. For decades, nineteenth-century city dwellers had ridden horse-drawn passenger railways — also known as trams, tramways, trolleys, trolley cars, or streetcars — along ① regular routes marked out by steel railways in the roadbed. They picked up and dropped off passengers when flagged or at designated stops, and, unlike a private taxi carriage, didn't need to be pre-hired. John Stephenson, an Irish-American businessman, got them rolling first down the Bowery in New York City in 1832. They were successful, but problems rapidly ② developed with the power source. Horses have to be fed, which required ③ massive supplies of hay and oats to be brought into the city, and once fed, horses created wastes that ④ fouled the streets and made walking an unpleasant, unhealthy, and smelly business, especially during fly season. Horses also die; a dead horse in a Manhattan street had to be moved to the river and dumped in. However, when choosing an outfit for a photoshoot, an influential blogger is guided not only by the profit motive but also, and primarily, by a sense of ⑤ style. Otherwise, the trust of subscribers may be ⑥ gained. For subscribers, their idol is not merely a guide to the latest fashion, but is the key to an ⑦ aspirational lifestyle. _____ is central in the lives of children. Organized sports provide contexts for making friends, but friendships are difficult to nurture when children see each other only at adult-controlled practices and games. Additionally, making friends with opponents is seldom considered in organized sports. Therefore, youth teams should be neighborhood- and school-based whenever possible. Pregame warm-ups should mix players from both teams, and players should introduce themselves to the person they line up with as each quarter or half begins. Unless children learn that games cannot exist without cooperation between opponents, they will have no understanding of fair play, why rules exist, why rule enforcement is necessary, and why players should follow game rules. Without this understanding, children don't have what it takes to maintain fair play at the same time that they strive for competitive success. When this occurs, youth sports are not worth our time and effort.

Large teams are notorious for _____ to make most decisions. Aligning calendars often takes time, and once you get everyone into a room (or, more likely, on a call), several attendees need to be brought up to speed. Some attendees will not have read the requisite material, and others will have been sent as substitutes for key decision-makers who could not make the time (and these substitutes will not be able to make any critical decisions without conferring with their boss). We've all attended these sorts of meetings. They rarely result in decisions — and they usually lead to additional meetings. A small team can deal with these issues much more easily. Fewer people need to be present to make decisions, and those present are typically much more involved in the details of the problem, so they don't need a meeting to ramp up before they can contribute. We cannot test for consciousness. This simple fact has been used to argue that consciousness doesn't even merit being considered a legitimate field of science. Science, it is argued, is objective, whereas consciousness is defined as subjective experience. How can there be a scientific study of consciousness? As the philosopher John Searle relates, years ago a famous neurobiologist responded to his repeated questions about consciousness by saying, "Look, in my discipline it's okay to be interested in consciousness, but get tenure first." Searle continues by noting that in this day and age, "you might actually get tenure by working on consciousness. If so, that's a real step forward." The bias against a scientific inquiry into consciousness seems to be thawing, with the realization that while consciousness is subjective experience, that subjective experience either objectively happens or not. Feeling at home is _____ because feelings themselves are the product of the human mind and body. Feelings and emotions evolved over the course of millions of years of evolution to help us regulate and monitor our internal state in relation to the external environment. Anger, fear, sadness, and the other emotions and feelings prime the body for action and help the mind make decisions about what we should or should not do. The feelings we associate with home are built on a cognitive foundation that we inherited from our ancestors. A feeling for home coupled with the inclination and ability to build a shelter for our bodies makes for a profound biocultural adaptation. This adaptation helps people survive in all manner of environments, far from the African woodlands and savannas where the human evolutionary journey first started some six million years ago.

There are fascinating effects of group size. In a dyad or triad, the host usually has the edge over the visitor; the host is more likely to get his or her own way. Thus, a businessperson can strike a better deal by inviting the other person to his or her office. But such territorial dominance — the so-called home court advantage — may disappear if the group is larger than a triad. In public places, a large group may also inhibit an individual from helping someone in distress. More than 50 studies have shown consistently that people are less likely to help a victim if others are around than if they are alone with the victim. A major reason is that the knowledge that others are present and available to respond allows the individual to shift some of the responsibility to others. The same factor operates in "_____": As the size of a group performing a certain task increases, each member tends to work less hard.

American industrialists and their European counterparts were taking capitalism to new levels of innovation and human improvement, resting in part on the cultural conditions that German sociologist and economist Max Weber called the Protestant ethic. The spirit of _____ was signified in the very physical spaces of America, a great stage that could nurture virtue and improvement. In 1893 historian Frederick Jackson Turner delivered his paper "The Significance of the Frontier in American History" at the American Historical Association. Whether or not his thesis that the frontier was the key factor in America's uniquely innovative and democratic character was accurate, the idea itself captured the imagination of generations of scholars and the educated public, becoming very nearly a self-fulfilling account. Like Charles Peirce, the philosopher of science, Turner was deeply influenced by evolutionary theory. According to his thesis, the seventeenth-century settlers were in effect forced to take an experimental attitude toward their situation, as the old European ways would not do.

In his famous book Man's Search for Meaning, Viktor Frankl writes, "Man's search for meaning is the primary motivation in his life." He quotes Nietzsche's words, "He who has a why to live for can bear with almost any how." But then Frankl made a crucial, helpful point: It's fruitless to try to _____ about what life in general means. The meaning of one's life is only discernible within the specific circumstances of one's own specific life. In the concentration camp, he writes, "We had to learn ourselves and, furthermore, we had to teach the despairing men, that it did not really matter what we expected from life, but rather what life expected from us. We needed to stop asking the meaning of life, and instead to think of ourselves as those who were being questioned by life — daily and hourly. Our answer must consist, not in talk and meditation, but in right action and right conduct."

Gaining self-knowledge through reflected self-appraisals might seem to suggest that we have little say in how we see ourselves. But the idea here is that we internalize how we think others appraise us, not necessarily how others actually see us. In fact, our reflected self-appraisals often do not correlate highly with the appraisals that others actually make of us. Figuring out how and to what degree reflected self-appraisals influence people's sense of self can be tricky. For example, Amy's view of herself as a clumsy person could stem from her perception that her family and friends see her this way — but it's also possible that her view of herself as clumsy is actually what led her to perceive these reflected self-appraisals. Until the mid-1800s it was not clear to what extent the laws of physics and chemistry, which were formulated from the observed behavior of inanimate matter, could be applied to living matter. It was certainly evident that on the large scale the laws were applicable. Animals are clearly subject to the same laws of motion as inanimate objects. The question of applicability (A)_____. Living organisms are very complex. Even a virus, which is one of the simplest biological organisms, consists of millions of interacting atoms. A cell, which is the basic building block of tissue, contains on the average 10^{14} atoms. Living organisms exhibit properties not found in inanimate objects. They grow, reproduce, and decay. These phenomena are so different from the predictable properties of inanimate matter that many scientists in the early 19th century believed that different laws governed the structure and organization of molecules in living matter. Even the physical origin of organic molecules was in question. These molecules tend to be larger and more complex than molecules obtained from inorganic sources. It was thought that the large molecules found in living matter could be produced only by living organisms through a "vital force" that could not be explained by the existing laws of physics. This concept was disproved in 1828 when Friedrich Wohler synthesized an organic substance, urea, from inorganic chemicals. Soon thereafter many other organic molecules were synthesized without the intervention of biological organisms. Today most scientists believe that there is no special vital force residing in organic substances. Living organisms (B)_____.

We cannot test for consciousness. This simple fact has been used to argue that consciousness doesn't even merit being considered a legitimate field of science. Science, it is argued, is objective, whereas consciousness is defined as subjective experience. How can there be a scientific study of consciousness? As the philosopher John Searle relates, years ago a famous neurobiologist responded to his repeated questions about consciousness by saying, "Look, in my discipline it's okay to be interested in consciousness, but get tenure first." Searle continues by noting that in this day and age, "you might actually get tenure by working on consciousness. If so, that's a real step forward." The bias against a scientific inquiry into consciousness seems to be thawing, with the realization that while consciousness is subjective experience, that subjective experience _____. Pain is also subjectively experienced, but it is objectively real.

① conclude an argument on the spot
② choose the best conditions
③ try to have a heart-to-heart talk
④ consider what the real problem is
⑤ either objectively happens or not

There are fascinating effects of _____. In a dyad or triad, the host usually has the edge over the visitor; the host is more likely to get his or her own way. Thus, a businessperson can strike a better deal by inviting the other person to his or her office. But such territorial dominance — the so-called home court advantage — may disappear if the group is larger than a triad. In public places, a large group may also inhibit an individual from helping someone in distress. More than 50 studies have shown consistently that people are less likely to help a victim if others are around than if they are alone with the victim. A major reason is that the knowledge that others are present and available to respond allows the individual to shift some of the responsibility to others. The same factor operates in "social loafing": As the size of a group performing a certain task increases, each member tends to work less hard.

① reflective delay

⑤ group size

In his famous book Man's Search for Meaning, Viktor Frankl writes, "Man's search for meaning is the primary motivation in his life." He quotes Nietzsche's words, "He who has a why to live for can bear with almost any how." But then Frankl made a crucial, helpful point: It's fruitless to try to think in the abstract about what life in general means. The meaning of one's life is only discernible within the specific circumstances of one's own specific life. In the concentration camp, he writes, "We had to learn ourselves and, furthermore, we had to teach the despairing men, that it did not really matter what we expected from life, but rather what life expected from us. We needed to stop asking the meaning of life, and instead to think of ourselves as those who _____ — daily and hourly. Gaining self-knowledge through reflected self-appraisals might seem to suggest that we _____. But the idea here is that we internalize how we think others appraise us, not necessarily how others actually see us. In fact, our reflected self-appraisals often do not correlate highly with the appraisals that others actually make of us. Figuring out how and to what degree reflected self-appraisals influence people's sense of self can be tricky. For example, Amy's view of herself as a clumsy person could stem from her perception that her family and friends see her this way — but it's also possible that her view of herself as clumsy is actually what led her to perceive these reflected self-appraisals. Indeed, self-views often affect reflected self-appraisals rather than the other way around. The upshot, then, is that although other people influence our sense of self through reflected self-appraisals, their impact may not be as simple and direct as the looking-glass self, referring to the idea that we see ourselves as others see us.

In the classic negotiation primer, Fisher and Ury give the example of two individuals fighting over a small number of oranges. Each needs the oranges for worthwhile purposes and there is no way to obtain additional oranges. The negotiators begin using competitive strategies — trying to convince each other to give up or sell the oranges. Because their claims on the oranges were assumed to be mutually exclusive, no deal could be reached — more oranges for one negotiator meant fewer oranges for the other. Then they changed to an integrative bargaining strategy. They sought to learn more about each other's needs with the goal of helping each other meet their needs. I confess that one of the most suggestive theories that I learned of in my course on the economics of science at the London School of Economics and Political Science was that of the 'tournament model'. It may be well known to many readers, but I was surprised that something that I thought was highly intuitive, such as human resource management, could be described in terms of an elaborate theory. The tournament theory was described in 1981 by economists Edward Lazear and Sherwin Rosen. They argued that a worker's performance (both evaluated and the incentive) can be modelled as a tennis tournament. There is only one prize: either you win and have everything or you lose and have nothing; glory is only for the first. And most US/UK experts who analyse the behaviour of science consider that this model fits the profession of a scientist like a glove. Why? Because everyone knows the winners of the Tour de France, but nobody remembers the runners-up. In science, it means if anyone comes to a result or a patent second, if only by a few hours, it is of no use to him. _____.

The new system of fashion that has emerged from the digital revolution is largely centered, in marketing terms, on popular bloggers, who have unprecedented influence due to their massive numbers of subscribers. If an elite blogger (an "influencer") has more than half a million subscribers, his or her influence can be worth a significant amount of money: the value of a single post mentioning a particular brand is in the range of five figures. Obviously, this approach leads to limited ability to make independent critical judgments. However, when choosing an outfit for a photoshoot, an influential blogger is guided not only by the profit motive but also, and primarily, by a sense of style. Otherwise, the trust of subscribers may be lost. For subscribers, their idol is not merely a guide to the latest fashion, but is the key to an aspirational lifestyle. The direct personal contact between popular bloggers and their subscribers allows the former to be _____ between the brand and the consumer. This role is not available to models, whose position makes no allowance for expressions of personal taste.

① a foreign workers
② an intermediary
③ a new technology
④ a cultural difference
⑤ an extreme complexity

Thinkers of the eighteenth century puzzled over what contemporary aesthetics calls 'the paradox of negative emotion in art'. L'Abbe Dubos noted that, 'at the theatre, man finds more pleasure weeping than he does laughing', in that 'the art of poetry and the art of painting are never more appreciated than when they succeed in stirring in us a sense of profound grief'. He wondered about the nature of this apparently 'secret charm that draws us to artistic depictions of overwhelming events, while at the same time an internal tremor tells us that we are contradicting our own understanding of pleasure'. David Hume also underlines the strangeness of this pleasure that seems to _____: 'It seems an unaccountable pleasure, which the spectators of a well-written tragedy receive from sorrow, terror, anxiety, and other passions that are in themselves disagreeable and uneasy. The more they are touched and affected, the more they are delighted with the spectacle'.

Organized sports provide contexts for making friends, but friendships are difficult to nurture when children see each other only at adult-controlled practices and games. Additionally, making friends with opponents is seldom considered in organized sports. Therefore, youth teams should be neighborhood- and school-based whenever possible. Pregame warm-ups should mix players from both teams, and players should introduce themselves to the person they line up with as each quarter or half begins. Unless children learn that games cannot exist without cooperation between opponents, they will have no understanding of fair play, why rules exist, why rule enforcement is necessary, and why players should follow game rules. Large teams are notorious for needing multiple steps to make most decisions. ① Aligning calendars often takes time, and once you get everyone into a room (or, more likely, on a call), several attendees need to be brought up to speed. ② Some attendees will not have read the requisite material, and others will have been sent as substitutes for key decision-makers who could not make the time (and these substitutes will not be able to make any critical decisions without conferring with their boss). ③ We've all attended these sorts of meetings. ④ They rarely result in decisions — and they usually lead to additional meetings. ⑤ Fewer people need to be present to make decisions, and those present are typically much more involved in the details of the problem, so they don't need a meeting to ramp up before they can contribute. Like Charles Peirce, the philosopher of science, Turner was deeply influenced by evolutionary theory.

American industrialists and their European counterparts were taking capitalism to new levels of innovation and human improvement, resting in part on the cultural conditions that German sociologist and economist Max Weber called the Protestant ethic. ① The spirit of adventure and possibility was signified in the very physical spaces of America, a great stage that could nurture virtue and improvement. ② In 1893 historian Frederick Jackson Turner delivered his paper "The Significance of the Frontier in American History" at the American Historical Association. ③ Whether or not his thesis that the frontier was the key factor in America's uniquely innovative and democratic character was accurate, the idea itself captured the imagination of generations of scholars and the educated public, becoming very nearly a self-fulfilling account. ④ According to his thesis, the seventeenth-century settlers were in effect forced to take an experimental attitude toward their situation, as the old European ways would not do. ⑤

Markets represent an institutional arena in which exchanges (buying and selling) of final goods and services and factors of production (labor, capital and natural resources) take place. Traditionally, economists group markets into two broad categories, namely product and factor markets. ① The product market is where the exchange of final goods and services occurs. ② In this market, demand and supply provide information about households and firms, respectively. ③ The factor market refers exclusively to the buying and selling of basic resources, such as labor, capital and natural resources. ④ In this submarket, demand imparts market information about firms and supply provides information about households. ⑤ Clearly, then, the roles played in the factor market by households and firms respectively are the reverse of their roles in the product market.

David Hume also underlines the strangeness of this pleasure that seems to contradict our human nature: 'It seems an unaccountable pleasure, which the spectators of a well-written tragedy receive from sorrow, terror, anxiety, and other passions that are in themselves disagreeable and uneasy.

① Thinkers of the eighteenth century puzzled over what contemporary aesthetics calls 'the paradox of negative emotion in art'. ② L'Abbe Dubos noted that, 'at the theatre, man finds more pleasure weeping than he does laughing', in that 'the art of poetry and the art of painting are never more appreciated than when they succeed in stirring in us a sense of profound grief'. ③ He wondered about the nature of this apparently 'secret charm that draws us to artistic depictions of overwhelming events, while at the same time an internal tremor tells us that we are contradicting our own understanding of pleasure'. ④ The more they are touched and affected, the more they are delighted with the spectacle'. ⑤

My son Ross enjoys playing with your son Jim very much, and my husband and I think Jim is a really good kid. ① However, the last couple of times Ross has come home from your house, he has had scratches and even a few small bite marks on his arm. ② Ross tells me they are from your new puppy, Raven. ③ We love dogs, and we want Ross to be comfortable around them. ④ After considering this, please let me know your plans. ⑤ I'd be glad to speak with you about this matter before the next time Ross and Jim (and Raven) get together.

Until the mid-1800s it was not clear to what extent the laws of physics and chemistry, which were formulated from the observed behavior of inanimate matter, could be applied to living matter. It was certainly evident that on the large scale the laws were applicable. Animals are clearly subject to the same laws of motion as inanimate objects. The question of applicability arose on a more basic level. Living organisms are very complex. Even a virus, which is one of the simplest biological organisms, consists of millions of interacting atoms. A cell, which is the basic building block of tissue, contains on the average 10^{14} atoms. Living organisms exhibit properties not found in inanimate objects. They grow, reproduce, and decay. ① These phenomena are so different from the predictable properties of inanimate matter that many scientists in the early 19th century believed that different laws governed the structure and organization of molecules in living matter. ② Even the physical origin of organic molecules was in question. ③ It was thought that the large molecules found in living matter could be produced only by living organisms through a "vital force" that could not be explained by the existing laws of physics. ④ Soon thereafter many other organic molecules were synthesized without the intervention of biological organisms. ⑤ Today most scientists believe that there is no special vital force residing in organic substances. Living organisms are governed by the laws of physics on all levels.

There are times in life when you have to do just that.

Don't you hate when you go to a buffet and everything tastes too good? You take great care to eat a healthy bountiful salad before you dig into the meats, vegetables, and side dishes. But such territorial dominance — the so-called home court advantage — may disappear if the group is larger than a triad.

There are fascinating effects of group size. In a dyad or triad, the host usually has the edge over the visitor; the host is more likely to get his or her own way. ① Thus, a businessperson can strike a better deal by inviting the other person to his or her office. ② In public places, a large group may also inhibit an individual from helping someone in distress. ③ More than 50 studies have shown consistently that people are less likely to help a victim if others are around than if they are alone with the victim. ④ A major reason is that the knowledge that others are present and available to respond allows the individual to shift some of the responsibility to others. ⑤ The same factor operates in "social loafing": As the size of a group performing a certain task increases, each member tends to work less hard.

In 1893 historian Frederick Jackson Turner delivered his paper "The Significance of the Frontier in American History" at the American Historical Association.

American industrialists and their European counterparts were taking capitalism to new levels of innovation and human improvement, resting in part on the cultural conditions that German sociologist and economist Max Weber called the Protestant ethic. ① The spirit of adventure and possibility was signified in the very physical spaces of America, a great stage that could nurture virtue and improvement. ② Whether or not his thesis that the frontier was the key factor in America's uniquely innovative and democratic character was accurate, the idea itself captured the imagination of generations of scholars and the educated public, becoming very nearly a self-fulfilling account. ③ Like Charles Peirce, the philosopher of science, Turner was deeply influenced by evolutionary theory. ④ According to his thesis, the seventeenth-century settlers were in effect forced to take an experimental attitude toward their situation, as the old European ways would not do. ⑤

In fact, our reflected self-appraisals often do not correlate highly with the appraisals that others actually make of us.

Gaining self-knowledge through reflected self-appraisals might seem to suggest that we have little say in how we see ourselves. ① But the idea here is that we internalize how we think others appraise us, not necessarily how others actually see us. ② Figuring out how and to what degree reflected self-appraisals influence people's sense of self can be tricky. ③ For example, Amy's view of herself as a clumsy person could stem from her perception that her family and friends see her this way — but it's also possible that her view of herself as clumsy is actually what led her to perceive these reflected self-appraisals. ④ Indeed, self-views often affect reflected self-appraisals rather than the other way around. ⑤ The upshot, then, is that although other people influence our sense of self through reflected self-appraisals, their impact may not be as simple and direct as the looking-glass self, referring to the idea that we see ourselves as others see us.

In this submarket, demand imparts market information about firms and supply provides information about households.

Markets represent an institutional arena in which exchanges (buying and selling) of final goods and services and factors of production (labor, capital and natural resources) take place. Traditionally, economists group markets into two broad categories, namely product and factor markets. ① The product market is where the exchange of final goods and services occurs. ② In this market, demand and supply provide information about households and firms, respectively. ③ The factor market refers exclusively to the buying and selling of basic resources, such as labor, capital and natural resources. ④ That is, households are the suppliers of labor, capital and natural resources, while firms are the buyers, and in turn use these items to produce final goods and services for the product market. ⑤ Clearly, then, the roles played in the factor market by households and firms respectively are the reverse of their roles in the product market.

We learn that some of these things can be said to friends and even more can be said to intimates.

All societies evolve rules of etiquette, good manners, and tact that specify what is or is not appropriate to say in any given situation. ① Most of us are, therefore, walking repositories of rules that were taught to us when young and that represent early layers of cultural socialization. ② We learn as part of our acculturation into the family that in the interests of getting along with each other, it is important to withhold some of our perceptions and feelings because to say them out loud might hurt or offend others. ③ And if we hurt others, that permits them to hurt us back, which makes social life generally too dangerous. ④ However, the basic assumptions about why you cannot say certain things remain below consciousness, and the process by which you learned them is probably totally forgotten. ⑤

Then they changed to an integrative bargaining strategy.

We know that negotiators often assume a situation is distributive and therefore competitive when indeed it is not necessarily so. In the classic negotiation primer, Fisher and Ury give the example of two individuals fighting over a small number of oranges. Each needs the oranges for worthwhile purposes and there is no way to obtain additional oranges. ① The negotiators begin using competitive strategies — trying to convince each other to give up or sell the oranges. ② Because their claims on the oranges were assumed to be mutually exclusive, no deal could be reached — more oranges for one negotiator meant fewer oranges for the other. ③ They sought to learn more about each other's needs with the goal of helping each other meet their needs. ④ In the end, they realized that one negotiator needed the juice of the orange and the other needed only the rind. ⑤ Their needs were not mutually exclusive, yet a traditional distributive bargaining approach would have resulted in impasse.

And most US/UK experts who analyse the behaviour of science consider that this model fits the profession of a scientist like a glove.

I confess that one of the most suggestive theories that I learned of in my course on the economics of science at the London School of Economics and Political Science was that of the 'tournament model'. It may be well known to many readers, but I was surprised that something that I thought was highly intuitive, such as human resource management, could be described in terms of an elaborate theory. The tournament theory was described in 1981 by economists Edward Lazear and Sherwin Rosen. ① They argued that a worker's performance (both evaluated and the incentive) can be modelled as a tennis tournament. ② There is only one prize: either you win and have everything or you lose and have nothing; glory is only for the first. ③ Why? Because everyone knows the winners of the Tour de France, but nobody remembers the runners-up. ④ In science, it means if anyone comes to a result or a patent second, if only by a few hours, it is of no use to him. ⑤ Only the first has any glory.

We cannot test for consciousness. This simple fact has been used to argue that consciousness doesn't even merit being considered a legitimate field of science. Science, it is argued, is objective, whereas consciousness is defined as subjective experience. ① How can there be a scientific study of consciousness? ② As the philosopher John Searle relates, years ago a famous neurobiologist responded to his repeated questions about consciousness by saying, "Look, in my discipline it's okay to be interested in consciousness, but get tenure first." Searle continues by noting that in this day and age, "you might actually get tenure by working on consciousness. If so, that's a real step forward." ③ In the second half of the 20th century, the idea that the artist is a person who rejects convention took an even stronger hold on the popular consciousness. ④ The bias against a scientific inquiry into consciousness seems to be thawing, with the realization that while consciousness is subjective experience, that subjective experience either objectively happens or not. ⑤ Pain is also subjectively experienced, but it is objectively real.

Feeling at home is a biological phenomenon because feelings themselves are the product of the human mind and body. ① Feelings and emotions evolved over the course of millions of years of evolution to help us regulate and monitor our internal state in relation to the external environment. ② Anger, fear, sadness, and the other emotions and feelings prime the body for action and help the mind make decisions about what we should or should not do. ③ The feelings we associate with home are built on a cognitive foundation that we inherited from our ancestors. ④ A feeling for home coupled with the inclination and ability to build a shelter for our bodies makes for a profound biocultural adaptation. ⑤ For human beings, children are linked to optimism in a way that runs deeper than just the biological continuation of the species. This adaptation helps people survive in all manner of environments, far from the African woodlands and savannas where the human evolutionary journey first started some six million years ago.

For decades, nineteenth-century city dwellers had ridden horse-drawn passenger railways — also known as trams, tramways, trolleys, trolley cars, or streetcars — along regular routes marked out by steel railways in the roadbed. ① They picked up and dropped off passengers when flagged or at designated stops, and, unlike a private taxi carriage, didn't need to be pre-hired. ② John Stephenson, an Irish-American businessman, got them rolling first down the Bowery in New York City in 1832. ③ They were successful, but problems rapidly developed with the power source. ④ Horses have to be fed, which required massive supplies of hay and oats to be brought into the city, and once fed, horses created wastes that fouled the streets and made walking an unpleasant, unhealthy, and smelly business, especially during fly season. ⑤ Most of the singing is done by males who use their large repertoire to impress females during the mating season. Alec introduced me to his parents formally. Elizabeth told me to call her Beth. She wrapped her arms around me in an unbreakable but gentle hold with a smile on her face.

We cannot test for consciousness.

(A) The bias against a scientific inquiry into consciousness seems to be thawing, with the realization that while consciousness is subjective experience, that subjective experience either objectively happens or not. Pain is also subjectively experienced, but it is objectively real.

(B) This simple fact has been used to argue that consciousness doesn't even merit being considered a legitimate field of science. Science, it is argued, is objective, whereas consciousness is defined as subjective experience. How can there be a scientific study of consciousness?

(C) As the philosopher John Searle relates, years ago a famous neurobiologist responded to his repeated questions about consciousness by saying, "Look, in my discipline it's okay to be interested in consciousness, but get tenure first." Searle continues by noting that in this day and age, "you might actually get tenure by working on consciousness. If so, that's a real step forward."

On February 1, 1960, four African American students entered a Greensboro Woolworth's store to buy school supplies.

(A) The next day more students sat at the counter — they too were never served. As news of the "sit-in" spread, students returned to the Greensboro Woolworth's and to other lunch counters across the South.

(B) White and Black American students alike from New York to San Francisco began picketing Woolworth's in support of the "Greensboro Four." This one act by four students was the pivotal step in propelling forward what became known as the American civil rights movement.

(C) If their money was good enough to buy school supplies, why not a cup of coffee, they reasoned. At 4:30 p.m., they sat at the "whites only" lunch counter, intending to place an order. The four young men sat at the counter until closing but were never served.

Feeling at home is a biological phenomenon because feelings themselves are the product of the human mind and body.

(A) The feelings we associate with home are built on a cognitive foundation that we inherited from our ancestors. A feeling for home coupled with the inclination and ability to build a shelter for our bodies makes for a profound biocultural adaptation.

(B) This adaptation helps people survive in all manner of environments, far from the African woodlands and savannas where the human evolutionary journey first started some six million years ago.

(C) Feelings and emotions evolved over the course of millions of years of evolution to help us regulate and monitor our internal state in relation to the external environment. Anger, fear, sadness, and the other emotions and feelings prime the body for action and help the mind make decisions about what we should or should not do.

There are fascinating effects of group size. In a dyad or triad, the host usually has the edge over the visitor; the host is more likely to get his or her own way.

(A) A major reason is that the knowledge that others are present and available to respond allows the individual to shift some of the responsibility to others. The same factor operates in "social loafing": As the size of a group performing a certain task increases, each member tends to work less hard.

(B) In public places, a large group may also inhibit an individual from helping someone in distress. More than 50 studies have shown consistently that people are less likely to help a victim if others are around than if they are alone with the victim.

(C) Thus, a businessperson can strike a better deal by inviting the other person to his or her office. But such territorial dominance — the so-called home court advantage — may disappear if the group is larger than a triad.

American industrialists and their European counterparts were taking capitalism to new levels of innovation and human improvement, resting in part on the cultural conditions that German sociologist and economist Max Weber called the Protestant ethic.

(A) Whether or not his thesis that the frontier was the key factor in America's uniquely innovative and democratic character was accurate, the idea itself captured the imagination of generations of scholars and the educated public, becoming very nearly a self-fulfilling account.

(B) The spirit of adventure and possibility was signified in the very physical spaces of America, a great stage that could nurture virtue and improvement. In 1893 historian Frederick Jackson Turner delivered his paper "The Significance of the Frontier in American History" at the American Historical Association.

(C) Like Charles Peirce, the philosopher of science, Turner was deeply influenced by evolutionary theory. According to his thesis, the seventeenth-century settlers were in effect forced to take an experimental attitude toward their situation, as the old European ways would not do.

In his famous book Man's Search for Meaning, Viktor Frankl writes, "Man's search for meaning is the primary motivation in his life."

(A) We needed to stop asking the meaning of life, and instead to think of ourselves as those who were being questioned by life — daily and hourly. Our answer must consist, not in talk and meditation, but in right action and right conduct."

(B) He quotes Nietzsche's words, "He who has a why to live for can bear with almost any how." But then Frankl made a crucial, helpful point: It's fruitless to try to think in the abstract about what life in general means.

(C) The meaning of one's life is only discernible within the specific circumstances of one's own specific life. In the concentration camp, he writes, "We had to learn ourselves and, furthermore, we had to teach the despairing men, that it did not really matter what we expected from life, but rather what life expected from us.

Gaining self-knowledge through reflected self-appraisals might seem to suggest that we have little say in how we see ourselves.

(A) For example, Amy's view of herself as a clumsy person could stem from her perception that her family and friends see her this way — but it's also possible that her view of herself as clumsy is actually what led her to perceive these reflected self-appraisals. Indeed, self-views often affect reflected self-appraisals rather than the other way around.

(B) But the idea here is that we internalize how we think others appraise us, not necessarily how others actually see us. In fact, our reflected self-appraisals often do not correlate highly with the appraisals that others actually make of us. Figuring out how and to what degree reflected self-appraisals influence people's sense of self can be tricky.

(C) The upshot, then, is that although other people influence our sense of self through reflected self-appraisals, their impact may not be as simple and direct as the looking-glass self, referring to the idea that we see ourselves as others see us.

Markets represent an institutional arena in which exchanges (buying and selling) of final goods and services and factors of production (labor, capital and natural resources) take place.

(A) The factor market refers exclusively to the buying and selling of basic resources, such as labor, capital and natural resources. In this submarket, demand imparts market information about firms and supply provides information about households.

(B) That is, households are the suppliers of labor, capital and natural resources, while firms are the buyers, and in turn use these items to produce final goods and services for the product market. Clearly, then, the roles played in the factor market by households and firms respectively are the reverse of their roles in the product market.

All societies evolve rules of etiquette, good manners, and tact that specify what is or is not appropriate to say in any given situation.

(C) Most of us are, therefore, walking repositories of rules that were taught to us when young and that represent early layers of cultural socialization.

(D) We learn as part of our acculturation into the family that in the interests of getting along with each other, it is important to withhold some of our perceptions and feelings because to say them out loud might hurt or offend others.

(A) And if we hurt others, that permits them to hurt us back, which makes social life generally too dangerous. We learn that some of these things can be said to friends and even more can be said to intimates.

(B) However, the basic assumptions about why you cannot say certain things remain below consciousness, and the process by which you learned them is probably totally forgotten.

For decades, nineteenth-century city dwellers had ridden horse-drawn passenger railways — also known as trams, tramways, trolleys, trolley cars, or streetcars — along regular routes marked out by steel railways in the roadbed.

(A) Horses also die; a dead horse in a Manhattan street had to be moved to the river and dumped in. Sanitation records from New York in 1880 showed fifteen thousand horses per year removed from city right-of-ways.

(B) They picked up and dropped off passengers when flagged or at designated stops, and, unlike a private taxi carriage, didn't need to be pre-hired. John Stephenson, an Irish-American businessman, got them rolling first down the Bowery in New York City in 1832. They were successful, but problems rapidly developed with the power source.

(C) Horses have to be fed, which required massive supplies of hay and oats to be brought into the city, and once fed, horses created wastes that fouled the streets and made walking an unpleasant, unhealthy, and smelly business, especially during fly season.

The new system of fashion that has emerged from the digital revolution is largely centered, in marketing terms, on popular bloggers, who have unprecedented influence due to their massive numbers of subscribers.

(A) The direct personal contact between popular bloggers and their subscribers allows the former to be an intermediary between the brand and the consumer. This role is not available to models, whose position makes no allowance for expressions of personal taste.

(B) However, when choosing an outfit for a photoshoot, an influential blogger is guided not only by the profit motive but also, and primarily, by a sense of style. Otherwise, the trust of subscribers may be lost. For subscribers, their idol is not merely a guide to the latest fashion, but is the key to an aspirational lifestyle.

(C) If an elite blogger (an "influencer") has more than half a million subscribers, his or her influence can be worth a significant amount of money: the value of a single post mentioning a particular brand is in the range of five figures. Obviously, this approach leads to limited ability to make independent critical judgments.

Thinkers of the eighteenth century puzzled over what contemporary aesthetics calls 'the paradox of negative emotion in art'.

(A) He wondered about the nature of this apparently 'secret charm that draws us to artistic depictions of overwhelming events, while at the same time an internal tremor tells us that we are contradicting our own understanding of pleasure'.

(B) David Hume also underlines the strangeness of this pleasure that seems to contradict our human nature: 'It seems an unaccountable pleasure, which the spectators of a well-written tragedy receive from sorrow, terror, anxiety, and other passions that are in themselves disagreeable and uneasy. The more they are touched and affected, the more they are delighted with the spectacle'.

(C) L'Abbe Dubos noted that, 'at the theatre, man finds more pleasure weeping than he does laughing', in that 'the art of poetry and the art of painting are never more appreciated than when they succeed in stirring in us a sense of profound grief'.

Until the mid-1800s it was not clear to what extent the laws of physics and chemistry, which were formulated from the observed behavior of inanimate matter, could be applied to living matter. It was certainly evident that on the large scale the laws were applicable. Animals are clearly subject to the same laws of motion as inanimate objects.

(A) This concept was disproved in 1828 when Friedrich Wohler synthesized an organic substance, urea, from inorganic chemicals. Soon thereafter many other organic molecules were synthesized without the intervention of biological organisms. Today most scientists believe that there is no special vital force residing in organic substances. Living organisms are governed by the laws of physics on all levels.

(B) The question of applicability arose on a more basic level. Living organisms are very complex. Even a virus, which is one of the simplest biological organisms, consists of millions of interacting atoms. A cell, which is the basic building block of tissue, contains on the average 10^{14} atoms. Living organisms exhibit properties not found in inanimate objects. They grow, reproduce, and decay.

(C) These phenomena are so different from the predictable properties of inanimate matter that many scientists in the early 19th century believed that different laws governed the structure and organization of molecules in living matter. Even the physical origin of organic molecules was in question. These molecules tend to be larger and more complex than molecules obtained from inorganic sources. It was thought that the large molecules found in living matter could be produced only by living organisms through a "vital force" that could not be explained by the existing laws of physics.

All societies evolve rules of etiquette, good manners, and tact [that / what] [specify / specifies] what is or is not appropriate [to say / says] in any given situation. Most of us are, therefore, walking repositories of rules [that / what] [taught / were taught] to us when young and that [represent / represents] early layers of cultural socialization. We learn as part of our acculturation into the family [that / what] in the interests of getting along with each other, [it / which] is important to withhold some of our perceptions and feelings [because / because of] to say them out loud might hurt or offend others. And if we hurt others, that permits them [to hurt / hurting] us back, which makes social life generally too [dangerous / dangerously]. We learn that some of these things can [say / be said] to friends and even more can [say / be said] to intimates. However, the basic assumptions about why you cannot say certain things [remain / remains] below consciousness, and the process [which / by which] you learned them [is / are] probably totally forgotten.

We know [that / what] negotiators often assume a situation is distributive and therefore competitive when indeed it is not [necessary / necessarily] so. In the classic negotiation primer, Fisher and Ury give the example of two individuals [fighting / fought] over a small number of oranges. Each needs the oranges for worthwhile purposes and there is no way to obtain additional oranges. The negotiators begin using competitive strategies — trying to convince each other [to give / giving] up or [sell / selling] the oranges. Because their claims on the oranges [assumed / were assumed] to be mutually exclusive, no deal could [reach / be reached] — more oranges for one negotiator meant fewer oranges for [another / the other]. Then they changed to an integrative bargaining strategy. They sought [to learn / learning] more about each other's needs with the goal of helping each other [meet / meeting] their needs. In the end, they realized [that / what] one negotiator needed the juice of the orange and [another / the other] needed only the rind. Their needs were not mutually exclusive, yet a traditional distributive bargaining approach would [have resulted / have been resulted] [in / from] impasse.

I confess [that / what] one of the most suggestive theories [that / what] I learned of in my course on the economics of science at the London School of Economics and Political Science [was / were] [that / those] of the 'tournament model'. It may be well known to many readers, but I was [surprising / surprised] [that / what] something [that / what] I thought [was / to be] [high / highly] intuitive, such as human resource management, could [describe / be described] in terms of an elaborate theory. The tournament theory [described / was described] in 1981 by economists Edward Lazear and Sherwin Rosen. They argued [that / what] a worker's performance (both evaluated and the incentive) can [model / be modelled] as a tennis tournament. There is only one prize: [both / either] you win and have everything or you lose and have nothing; glory is only for the first. And most US/UK experts who analyse the behaviour of science [consider / considers] [that / what] this model fits the profession of a scientist like a glove. Why? Because everyone knows the winners of the Tour de France, but nobody remembers the runners-up. In science, it means if anyone comes to a result or a patent second, if only by [a few / a little] hours, it is of no use to him. Only the first has any glory.

For decades, nineteenth-century city dwellers had ridden horse-drawn passenger railways — also [known / were known] as trams, tramways, trolleys, trolley cars, or streetcars — along regular routes [marking / marked] out by steel railways in the roadbed. They picked up and dropped off passengers when [flagging / flagged] or at designated stops, and, unlike a private taxi carriage, didn't need [to pre-hire / to be pre-hired]. John Stephenson, an Irish-American businessman, [getting / got] them rolling first down the Bowery in New York City in 1832. They were successful, but problems rapidly developed with the power source. Horses have [to feed / to be fed], which required massive supplies of hay and oats [to bring / to be brought] into the city, and once [feeding / fed], horses created wastes [that / what] fouled the streets and made walking an unpleasant, unhealthy, and smelly business, especially during fly season. Horses also die; a dead horse in a Manhattan street had to move / [to be moved] to the river and dumped in. Sanitation records from New York in 1880 showed fifteen thousand horses per year [removing / removed] from city right-of-ways.

The new system of fashion [that / what] [has emerged / has been emerged] from the digital revolution [largely centers / is largely centered], in marketing terms, on popular bloggers, who have unprecedented influence due to their massive numbers of subscribers. If an elite blogger (an "influencer") has more than half a million subscribers, his or her influence can be worth a significant amount of money: the value of a single post [mentioning / mentioning about] a particular brand is in the range of five figures. Obviously, this approach leads to limited ability to make independent critical judgments. However, when [choosing / chosen] an outfit for a photoshoot, an influential blogger [guides / is guided] not only by the profit motive but also, and primarily, by a sense of style. Otherwise, the trust of subscribers may [lose / be lost]. For subscribers, their idol is not [mere / merely] a guide to the latest fashion, but is the key to an aspirational lifestyle. The direct personal contact between popular bloggers and their subscribers [allow / allows] the former [to be / being] an intermediary between the brand and the consumer. This role is not available to models, [which / whose] position makes no allowance for expressions of personal taste.

Thinkers of the eighteenth century puzzled over [what / how] contemporary aesthetics [calls / is called] 'the paradox of negative emotion in art'. L'Abbe Dubos noted [that / what], 'at the theatre, man finds more pleasure weeping than he [is / does] laughing', [in that / in what] 'the art of poetry and the art of painting [is / are] never more [appreciating / appreciated] than when they succeed in stirring in us a sense of profound grief'. He wondered about the nature of this apparently 'secret charm [that / what] draws us to artistic depictions of [overwhelming / overwhelmed] events, [while / during] at the same time an internal tremor tells us [that / what] we are contradicting our own understanding of pleasure'. David Hume also underlines the strangeness of this pleasure [that / what] seems [to contradict / contradicting] our human nature: 'It seems an unaccountable pleasure, which the spectators of a well-written tragedy [receive / receives] from sorrow, terror, anxiety, and [another / other] passions [that / what] are in themselves disagreeable and uneasy. The more they [touch / are touched] and [affect / affected], the more they are [delighting / delighted] with the spectacle'.

Until the mid-1800s it was not clear to what extent the laws of physics and chemistry, which [formulated / were formulated] from the observed behavior of inanimate matter, could [apply / be applied] to living matter. It was certainly evident [that / what] on the large scale the laws were applicable. Animals are clearly subject to the same laws of motion as inanimate objects. The question of applicability [arose / aroused] on a more basic level. Living organisms [is / are] very complex. Even a virus, which is one of the simplest biological organisms, [consists / is consisted] of millions of interacting atoms. A cell, which is the basic building block of tissue, [containing / contains] on the average 10^{14} atoms. Living organisms [exhibit / exhibits] properties not [finding / found] in inanimate objects. They grow, reproduce, and decay. These phenomena are so different from the predictable properties of inanimate matter [that / what] many scientists in the early 19th century believed [that / what] different laws governed the structure and organization of molecules in living matter. Even the physical origin of organic molecules [was / were] in question. These molecules tend [to be / being] larger and more complex than molecules [obtained / were obtained] from inorganic sources. It was thought [that / what] the large molecules [found / was found] in living matter could [produce / be produced] only by living organisms through a "vital force" [that / what] could not [explain / be explained] by the [existing / existed] laws of physics. This concept [disproved / was disproved] in 1828 when Friedrich Wohler synthesized an organic substance, urea, from inorganic chemicals. Soon thereafter many other organic molecules [synthesized / were synthesized] without the intervention of biological organisms. Today most scientists believe [that / what] there is no special vital force [residing / resided] in organic substances. Living organisms [are governed / governed] by the laws of physics on all levels.

A wise king wanted his only son also [to be / being] a wise man before becoming his successor. The king was an extraordinary man who selected a very strange way. He summoned the prince one day and said, "You are no longer a prince and I am not going to make you my successor." He sent the son away from the kingdom and abandoned him completely. The prince was [shocking / shocked], and he [left / was left] as a beggar in an alien land. The king gave strict orders [that / what] he should not [allow / be allowed] back into the kingdom. Over the years the prince really became a beggar and totally forgot his princehood. He was literally begging for food, clothes and shelter and gradually became [accustoming / accustomed] to the condition he was in. Many years passed. Then, one day he was sitting in a busy street [crying / cried] out for just a few coins to buy some food. Suddenly a golden chariot stopped before him, and a man descended. The man said, "Your father has called you back. He is very old and dying, and he wants you [to be / being] his successor." In a split second the beggar [disappeared / was disappeared]. The man was totally changed — his face became radiant, eyes [reflecting / reflected] the princely majesty. A great crowd gathered — people who before [being / were] ignoring his stretched-out hands for a few coins — there to show great respect. But without paying any attention to them he sat in the chariot and told the charioteer, "Take me to a place [which / where] I can have a good bath, find clothes worthy of me, shoes, ornaments... because I can go before the king only as a prince." He came as a prince. He said to his father, "Just tell me one thing: Why did I have to be a beggar for so many years?" The King said, "It was not [doing / done] to harm you, but [to give / giving] you experience of the extremes of life — the beggar and the king. And between these two, everybody [exists / is existed]."

In fact, our reflected (C)_____ often do not (D)[correlate / cooperate] highly with the appraisals that others actually make of us. Figuring out how and to what degree reflected (C)_____ influence people's sense of self can be (E)[simple / tricky]. For example, Amy's view of herself as a clumsy person could stem from her (F)[perception / inception] that her family and friends see her this way — but it's also possible that her view of herself as clumsy is actually what led her to perceive these reflected (C)_____. Indeed, (G)[self-views / self-destruction] often affect reflected (C)_____ rather than the other way around. The upshot, then, is that although other people influence our sense of self through reflected (C)_____, their impact may not be as (H)[simple and direct / complex and indirect] as the (I)_____, referring to the idea (J)that we see ourselves as others see us.

Markets represent an (A)_____ arena (B)which exchanges (buying and selling) of final goods and services and factors of production (labor, capital and natural resources) (C)take place. Traditionally, economists group markets into two (D)_____ categories, namely product and factor markets. The (E)_____ is where the exchange of (F)_____ goods and services (G)occur. In this market, demand and supply provide information about households and firms, respectively. The (H)_____ (I)refer (J)_____ to the buying and selling of (K)_____, such as labor, capital and natural resources. In this submarket, demand (L)_____ market information about firms and supply (M)provide information about households. That is, households are the (N)_____ of labor, capital and natural resources, while firms are the buyers, and in turn use these items to produce final goods and services for the product market. Clearly, then, the roles (O)play in the factor market by households and firms respectively (P)be the (Q)_____reverse of their roles in the product market.

We know that negotiators often assume a situation is (A)[distributive / competitive] and therefore (B)[distributive / competitive] when indeed it is not necessarily (C)so. Thinkers of the eighteenth century puzzled over what contemporary aesthetics calls 'the (A)_____'. L'Abbe Dubos noted that, 'at the theatre, man finds more (B)_____ weeping than he (C)does laughing', (D)시 예술과 회화 예술은 그것들이 우리 안에 깊은 슬픔의 감각을 불러일으키는 데 성공할 때보다 더 잘 감상되는 경우는 결코 없다'라는 점에서. He wondered about the nature of this apparently 'secret charm that (E)_____ us to artistic depictions of overwhelming events, while at the same time an (F)_____ tells us that we are (G)_____ our own understanding of pleasure'. David Hume also underlines the (H)_____ of this pleasure that seems (I)_____ our human nature: 'It seems an (J)_____ pleasure, (K)which the spectators of a well-written tragedy receive from sorrow, terror, anxiety, and other passions that are in themselves (L)_____. (M) 그들이 더 많이 감동하고 영향을 받을수록, 그들은 그 광경에 더 많이 기뻐한다'.

Until the mid-1800s (A)it was not clear to what extent the laws of physics and chemistry, (B)which (C)formulate from the observed behavior of (D)_____ matter, could (E)apply to living matter. (F)It was certainly evident that on the large scale the laws were (G)_____. Animals are clearly subject to the same laws of (H)_____ as (I)_____ objects. The question of (J)_____ arose on a more basic level. Living organisms (K)be very (L)_____. Even a virus, which is one of the simplest biological organisms, (M)consist of millions of (N)_____ atoms. A cell, which is the basic building block of tissue, (O)contain on the average 10^{14} atoms. Living organisms exhibit properties not (P)find in (Q)_____ objects. They grow, reproduce, and decay. These phenomena (R)be so different from the (S)_____ properties of (T)_____ that many scientists in the early 19th century believed that different laws governed the structure and organization of molecules in (U)_____. Even the physical origin of (V)[organic / inorganic] molecules was in question. These molecules tend to be larger and more complex than molecules (W)obtain from (X)[organic / inorganic] sources. (Y)It (Z)think that the large molecules (AB)find in (AC)_____ could (AD)produce only by living organisms through a "(AE)_____" that could not (AF)explain by the existing laws of physics. This concept (AG)disprove in 1828 when Friedrich Wohler synthesized an (AH)[organic / inorganic] substance, urea, from (AI)[organic / inorganic] chemicals. Soon thereafter many other (AJ)[organic / inorganic] molecules (AK)synthesize without the (AL)_____ of biological organisms. Today most scientists believe that there is no special (AM)_____ (AN)reside in (AO)[organic / inorganic] substances. Living organisms (AP)govern by the laws of physics on all levels.

A wise king wanted his only son also (A)be a wise man before becoming his successor. The king was an extraordinary man who selected a very strange way. He summoned the prince one day and said, "You are no longer a prince and I am not going to make you my successor." He sent the son away from the kingdom and abandoned him completely. The prince was (B)shock, and he (C)leave as a beggar in an alien land. The king gave strict orders that he should not (D)allow back into the kingdom. Over the years the prince really became a beggar and totally forgot his princehood. He was literally begging for food, clothes and shelter and gradually became (E)accustom to the condition he was in. Many years passed. Then, one day he was sitting in a busy street (F)cry out for just a few coins to buy some food. Suddenly a golden chariot stopped before him, and a man descended. The man said, "Your father has called you back. He is very old and dying, and he wants you (G)be his successor." In a split second the beggar (H)disappear. The man was totally changed — his face became radiant, eyes (I)reflect the princely majesty. A great crowd gathered — people who before (J)be ignoring his stretched-out hands for a few coins — there to show great respect. But without paying any attention to them he sat in the chariot and told the charioteer, "Take me to a place (K)which I can have a good bath, find clothes worthy of me, shoes, ornaments... because I can go before the king only as a prince." He came as a prince. He said to his father, "Just tell me one thing: Why did I have to be a beggar for so many years?" The King said, "It was not (L)do to harm you, but to give you experience of the extremes of life — the beggar and the king. And between these two, everybody (M)exist."
