Consumers usually attempt ① to spend as little as possible. However, it is often the case that people become too concerned with spending as little as possible in the short term, ② while ignoring the long-term cost of their expenditures. Homebuilders are keenly aware ③ that most homebuyers are trying to buy a home for the lowest price possible. However, in the case of the new home, this is not the most important issue for a wise consumer. Most homes ④ are purchased through a mortgage, and a wise homebuyer should be ⑤ interested not just in the price of the mortgage, but also in the total price of owning and ⑥ maintaining a home. Besides maintenance and insurance costs, this would include the mortgage and utility payments. It is usually the case that a more energy-efficient home costs more to build, and therefore ⑦ has a higher mortgage payment. However, a more energy-efficient home also will ⑧ result from smaller utility payments.

In the absence of serious time management, it's easy for your days to fill up with urgent but unimportant activities.

What urgent tasks are you facing this week? Make a list. Then compare that list of urgent tasks to your list of critical and enabling goals. Do you see anything resembling a match? ① Don't be surprised if most of the "urgent" issues on your list have nothing to do with your critical and enabling goals. ② The same applies to many of the commitments we all make to others in the spirit of helpfulness. ③ "Yes, I'll help you with that report," you tell a colleague. "Yes, I'll volunteer to sell raffle tickets for the school fund-raiser." ④ Commitments like these keep us busy without necessarily bringing us closer to our higher goals. ⑤ To be an effective time manager, you must discipline yourself to differentiate between what is urgent and important and what is simply urgent. When you recognize the difference, you'll know best how to allocate your time.

Consumers usually attempt to spend as little as possible. However, it is often the case that people become too concerned with spending as little as possible in the short term, while ignoring the long-term cost of their expenditures. Homebuilders are keenly aware that most homebuyers are trying to buy a home for the lowest price possible. However, in the case of the new home, this is not the most important issue for a wise consumer. Most homes are purchased through a mortgage, and a wise homebuyer should be interested not just in the price of the mortgage, but also _____. Besides maintenance and insurance costs, this would include the mortgage and utility payments. It is usually the case that a more energy-efficient home costs more to build, and therefore has a higher mortgage payment. However, a more energy-efficient home also will result in smaller utility payments.

It is obvious that organized party spirit is one of the greatest dangers of our time. In the form of nationalism it leads to wars between nations, and in other forms it leads to civil war. It should be the business of teachers to stand outside the strife of parties and endeavour to instill into the young the habit of impartial inquiry, leading them to judge issues on their merits and _____. The teacher should not be expected to flatter the prejudices either of the mob or of officials. His professional virtue should consist in a readiness to do justice to all sides, and in an endeavour to rise above controversy into a region of dispassionate scientific investigation. If there are people to whom the results of his investigation are inconvenient, he should be protected against their resentment, unless it can be shown that he has lent himself to dishonest propaganda by the dissemination of demonstrable untruths.

What urgent tasks are you facing this week? Make a list. Then compare that list of urgent tasks to your list of critical and enabling goals. Do you see anything resembling a match? Don't be surprised if most of the "urgent" issues on your list have nothing to do with your critical and enabling goals. In the absence of serious time management, it's easy for your days to fill up with urgent but unimportant activities. The same applies to _____. "Yes, I'll help you with that report," you tell a colleague. "Yes, I'll volunteer to sell raffle tickets for the school fund-raiser." Commitments like these keep us busy without necessarily bringing us closer to our higher goals. To be an effective time manager, you must discipline yourself to differentiate between what is urgent and important and what is simply urgent. When you recognize the difference, you'll know best how to allocate your time.
