"Capitalism" is generally understood as a market-based, economic system governed by capital — that is, the wealth of an individual or an establishment accumulated by or employed in its business activities. Entrepreneurs and the institutions they create generate the capital with which businesses provide goods, services, and payments to workers. Defenders of capitalism argue that this system maximally distributes social freedoms and desirable resources, resulting in the best economic outcomes for everyone in society. On this view, business's only social responsibilities are to _____. However, over the past several decades there has been a significant reaction against this view. It is argued that businesses have responsibilities far beyond following the law and profit making. When society accepts capitalism, this view holds, it need not also accept the view that economic freedom always has priority over competing conceptions of the collection and distribution of social goods, or of other responsibilities owed to employees, customers, society, and the environment.
